

Religious communities as interlocutors for the local policy making.
An exploratory study on the cases of Italy and Rome.

Authors

Valeria Fabretti is Adjunct Professor of Sociology at the University 'Tor Vergata' of Rome and Research Fellow in Sociology at the University 'Sapienza' of Rome (Italy). She received her PhD in 'Social Systems, Organizations and Public Policy Analysis' in 2009 at 'Sapienza'. She is a member of: 'Centre for the Study and Documentation of Religions and Political Institutions in Post-Secular Society', University of Rome 'Tor Vergata', and 'Religion & Public Institutions' International Research Network. Her studies regards: pluralism and the governance of religious diversity in social spaces/public institutions; second generation/young migrants' religious identities and experiences; conflicts and social mediation.

Enza Roberta Petrillo is a Post-Doctoral Researcher at EuroSapienza, the Centre for European, International and Development Studies of the University Sapienza of Rome. Her research interests include national and EU migration policy, forced migration, EU borderlands, Trans-border Smuggling and Eastern European Politics and Geopolitics. Graduated with mention in Political Science (2003) and Ph.D. in Geopolitics (2009), she has ten years of progressive professional experience in policy-oriented analysis including service for International Organizations, NGOs, Think-Tanks, and Governmental Institutions. She has extensive experience in field research in Eastern European Countries and in analyzing complex political and social settings, using qualitative research methodology.